PAGE M'CARTY, THE AGGRESSOR.

Among the members of the Richmon club is a young gentleman of elegant leisure, named Page McCarty. He is of good Virginia lineage; a nephew of the Virginia Cor.gressman McCarty, who, some time in 1842, fought a duel with muskets at Bladens burg, with John Thompson Mason, his brother-in-law, a United States Senator from State, which resulted in the immediate death of Mason and the loss of one of Mc Carty's arms. This ancient duel at the time occurrence was remarked as a bloody one. The first preposition to tie their hands together and jump off the capitol at Washington was rejected, and the scarcely less humane one accepted to fight at one pace distance with one ounce ball and three buckshot. As might be expected, Col. McCarty was turned gray in a single night, and he sought
